

Prejudice between Educators

Marija Šlutej

International School for Social and Business Studies, Slovenia

mari.lah05@gmail.com

Abstract

We face prejudice every day in all areas of our life. They arise in different ways and are in each of us. We need to be aware that many prejudices stem from early childhood, which emphasizes the importance of institutions and education in upbringing. From adults, children judge the outside world. Research has highlighted that family, kindergarten, school, media, and children's literature influence the origin of prejudice in children. The environments and relationships in which children grow up are therefore crucial for the development of prejudice.

The diversity of children is reflected in gender, socio-economic status, health status, cultural background, religion, nationality ... The role of the entire environment of schools and kindergartens is crucial. The inclusion of diverse children strengthens the participation of children, educators and parents. It prevents exclusion and ensures equal opportunities for all, as it respects diversity. One of the fundamental principles is the principle of equal opportunities, which states that we must treat all students equally and ensure equal rights and obligations for all. It is important to improve the situation of all children in all their environments, regardless of their circumstances.

Keywords: prejudice, consequences, learning environment, the role of a school, zero tolerance.