Abstract

Rapid progress and consumption opportunities lead us to an era where financial literacy as a lifelong competence will become significantly important. Good financial management skills impact society generally. It is the only way the economic circle can function successfully. We want to examine the financial literacy of young people aged 18-29, who are either just entering the labour market or are already making some financial investments such as buying a house or a car at the same time. We wanted to find out who or what is the primary source of information on this topic. The results have partly confirmed our predictions. We also get an insight into where we need to focus more energy and knowledge to bring such an essential competence as financial literacy to a generation with a lot of information at its disposal. Still, the question is whether all of it is relevant.
